Something REAL BIG In 1983?

By Art Daley, Green Bay Packer Yearbook Editor

The headline on this page in the 1982 Packer Yearbook read as follows:

Packers on Verge of Something BIG.

It was a prediction based on the Pack's 6-2 finish in the 1981 season, giving them a final 8-8 record.

The 1982 Packers came up with "something big" — a 5-3-1 finish in the strike-shortened season and a split in two Playoff Games. At times they were exceptionally impressive.

What does all this mean for the new 1983 season?

It doesn't necessarily mean that the Packers will go all the way to the Super Bowl but it does mean that they have enough confidence in their ability to make it to Super Bowl XVIII.

The big payoff on the 1982 season came in the Playoffs. In the first round of the Super Bowl Tournament, the Packers crunched the St. Louis Cardinals in Green Bay 41-16 and then lost a thrilling 37-26 decision to the Cowboys.

The Pack gained a lot of respect in their defeat at Dallas as they roared back with 19 points and 363 yards in the second half. Only a few mistakes might have stood in the way of a victory.

The 1982 league season had its ups and downs. The Bays launched operations with wins over the Los Angeles Rams and New York Giants, outscoring those two foes 55-6 in the second half. After the frightful strike, they finished with 3-3-1 and two of the losses were to the Detroit Lions, both big disappointments. The tie was administered by the lowly Baltimore Colts who overcame a 20-6 deficit in the fourth quarter.

The rip-snorting manner in which the Packers performed in the Playoffs obliterated any misgivings over some of the sobering moments during the league campaign.

And now it's a new season—the Pack's 65th in the sport and 63rd in the National Football League, and optimism is running wild.

Packer fans, naturally, are higher than a kite and even the powerful television moguls are expecting great things. The Packers were awarded three Monday television spots—a true indication that the Packers certainly are among the NFL's elite.

Coach Bart Starr, in his pre-season analysis, explained his feelings this way: "The people are here to do the job, although we need to strengthen the team in several areas and we need to improve our depth and backup strength. But we have the manpower to win."

The people, though they win or lose as a team, are divided into offense and defense—not to mention special teams.

Starr brought in Bob Schnelker as his offensive coordinator last season and the one-time Lombardi assistant led the offense into some major improvements. The offense tied Dallas for the NFC lead in scoring with 226 points, an average of 25.1 (it was 20.2 in '81). This unit averaged 323.3 yards per game compared to 303.7 the previous year. In addition, the club averaged 33.5 points in two playoff games.

Schnelker is looking for more consistency from the offense. He noted that the unit's few bad days were "very bad days. "We have to eliminate those. The same way with interceptions. We went for several games last year with none or maybe one, then would have four or five in one game."

The Packer offense has all kinds of potential and could be the envy of the league.

The offensive spark is the aerial game—headed by Quarterback Lynn Dickey and three Pro Bowl receivers, James Lofton, John Jefferson and Paul Coffman. The unit has good backups in QBs David Whitehurst and Rich Campbell and Receivers Phil Epps and Gary Lewis. Adding more fuel will be Receivers Ron Cassidy, a holdover, and Mike Miller and Byron Williams, draftees.

With Epps coming on strong, the Packers may use a three-wide receiver attack on more occasions this season.

The success of the passing game, of course, depends so much on the offensive line and the running backs.

Karl Swanke started at left tackle last year but went down and reliable Tim Stokes took over, with Angelo Fields working as backup. Ron Hallstrom has been shifted from guard to left tackle and Fields is coming out of the Fat Farm to make it a four-way fight.

Tim Huffman figures to get better at left guard and incumbent Leotis Harris may get pushed by highly-touted draftee Dave Dreschler out of North Carolina, plus Ron Sams of Pittsburgh. Other guards in the fight are Larry Pfohl and Syd Kitson.

The key to the Pack's running game will be Gerry Ellis, the fourth year running back. Loaded with talent, Ellis seemed to be tentative in his rushing last year, averaging less than four yards per carry for the first time.

Fully recovered from an injury that floored him in '81, Eddie Lee Ivery could really blossom out this season. These two starters will have plenty of competition from holdovers Del Rodgers, Mike Meade and Harlan Huckleby—plus newcomer Allan Clark and draftees Bryan Thomas of Pittsburgh and Jessie Clark of Arkansas. This unit also has a new coach—John Brunner, former Detroit Lion assistant, who replaces Pete Kettela, new head coach of Edmonton in Canada.

Gary Lewis made the big block of 1982, preventing a 44-yard field goal and a possibly damaging loss in overtime at Baltimore.

Defensively, the 1982 Packers allowed an average of 18.7 points over the nine-game haul, a fifth place finish in the NFL, compared to an average of 22.5 and 11th place a year ago.

Coordinator John Meyer wants his defense to finish among the top five in the NFL this year—a spot they missed by just 100 yards a year ago. The unit improved from 19th to 6th place in stopping the run in 1982.

The defense's strength is wrapped around a fine foursome of linebackers —Mike Douglass and John Anderson on the outside and George Cumby and Randy Scott on the inside. They'll be pushed hard by Rich Wingo, Guy Prather, Cliff Lewis, Chet Parlavecchio and Mark Merrill. This unit has a new coach—Monte Kiffin, who replaces John Marshall, now defensive coordinator at Atlanta.

The defensive line is back intact—Ezra Johnson and Mike Butler at the ends and Terry Jones at nose tackle, but so are all the so-called backups. Whatever, there should be some exciting competition for the starting spots among such people as Casey Merrill, Byron Braggs and Robert Brown at ends and Richard Turner at nose tackle. The line's emphasis will be rushing the quarterback.

The defensive secondary may undergo some changes and the big push likely will be on speed to combat all of the opponents' swift pass catchers.

The holdover unit had Mark Lee and Mike McCoy at the corners, Johnnie Gray at left safety and Maurice Harvey at right. They were backed up by Estus Hood and Whitaker at corner and Mark Murphy and Mike Jolly at safety.

The 1983 draft would indicate that some changes might be in order. Three defensive backs were selected, including the No. 1 choice—Tim Lewis of Pittsburgh, in addition to eighth pick Carlton Briscoe of McNeese State and 10th pick Jimmy Thomas, a basketball player out of Indiana who has good speed and amazing leaping ability.

The Packers' special teams didn't set the league on fire in 1982 but one of the units played a critical role in preserving a tie at Baltimore. The Colts went for a field goal in the overtime for a possible win but Gary Lewis blocked it, one of four for him during the year.

Jan Stenerud, who will turn 40 on Nov. 26—the day before the Pack plays at Atlanta, is returning for his 17th season but he'll get a good push by young Eddie Garcia, a strong legger who threatened Stenerud last year until he was felled by an injury.

The Packers drafted the highly-prized Kansas punter, Bucky Scribner, to give holdover Ray Stachowicz some competition. A left-footed punter, Scribner led the Big Eight conference for three straight years on an average of 44.6 yards on 216 kicks. He averaged 45.8 as a senior.

And there you have it—the 1983 Packers. They could be on the verge of something . . . REAL BIG!

The Packers' new bad-weather indoor practice building sprawls over 55,000 square feet.

Bart: Facilities Set Standard

By Lee Remmel, Green Bay Packer Director of Public Relations

Modesty being one of his predominant traits, Bart Starr makes no claims to clairvoyance. George Orwell, he would be the first to admit, he is not. Yet the scholarly Packer coach has more than a little in common with the prophetic author of '1984.'

Early in a 16-year playing career, longest in team history, he gained celebrity for his tactical foresight while presiding at quarterback during the Packers' golden '60s, a period in which Green Bay captured five National Football League championships and dominated the professional football scene. His ability to construct a scoring drive with methodical anticipation and deliberation brought him league-wide respect and the admiration of his late coach, Vince Lombardi.

Since becoming a head coach himself in 1975, a role which now finds him in his ninth year as overseer of the Packers' field fortunes, this quality has served him well in a broader spectrum. Always aware personnel is the basic essential to the winning process, he long has been convinced there are other, off-the-field elements which can have a profound effect upon a team's psyche and success—or lack thereof.

As a man of vision, he also has had an accompanying conviction for nearly a decade—that the Packers would need to be in the forefront in these non-football areas if they were to remain in Green Bay and the NFL on a long term basis.

It thus is a source of considerable comfort and satisfaction to the former field general, entering the 1983 season, to know the Packers' physical facilities now are not only second to none in all of pro football but are setting the standard—a high standard—for the competition.

Understandably, his eyes light up at mention of the team's sprawling new indoor practice facility, a $750,000 structure erected in 1982, and the 29,000-square foot, $2,600,000 addition to the administration building—just completed in time for the '83 season—which has more than doubled the organization's existing space and houses huge new dressing, meeting and training rooms, plus racquetball courts and what well may be the nation's largest jacuzzi.

"I've been pushing for these for eight years," he quietly confided while reflecting upon these salutary developments in his well-ordered Lambeau Field office. "The building addition and the indoor practice facility have been special projects personally for eight years, because I genuinely believe that if we did not have these then the future of this football team was not secured from that perspective.

"No one knew what direction the bargaining talks would go prior to last year, but in looking at the future of our franchise long range, we felt that if free agency—as we know it in other sports—became a reality in professional football, first class facilities and an indoor practice facility were a 'must' if this franchise were to survive.

"Good planning is done years in advance," Starr pointed out, "and thus we started thinking about this—and by 'we' I mean not only myself but team officials and others—some time ago."

Now, he says, the wherewithal for survival is no longer a concern.

"I feel we can be fully competitive with anyone else in professional football now," the Packer coach asserted.

He then proceeded to cite a recent and celebrated case to document his point. "If John Elway didn't want to go to a desirable part of the country like Baltimore, for example, it would be very difficult to convince him that this is where he could enjoy a successful career without something like we now have.

"I think these new facilities are a tremendous recruiting tool, and we will put all of these to good use. Our new players—our rookies who observed them during our mini-camp early in May—were highly impressed even though they were in the very rough stages of construction then."

Recruiting aside, the Packer coach was asked, what can an indoor practice building and new training facilities do for a football team, namely the Packers?

Without hesitation, Starr rejoined, "These lastest improvements can provide us with a broader foundation from which to build a continuing winning football program.

"Our staff is indebted to Judge Parins (Packer president) and the Executive Committee, I might add, for the progressive attitude which brought about these ambitious projects."

Although the practice facility was used for only the first time last November, it already has proved of inestimable value, Starr said. With it available, he pointed out, "You're able to practice exactly what you need to be working on at that time of the year without concern for weather and the exposure of your players to the elements.

"At this latitude, at that time of the season—when your team should be at its best and seeking to be even better—without a facility like this, you're forced to shorten your practices and make other adjustments which could significantly affect the results that you're seeking.

"Last year was a prime example of what I'm talking about, because we encountered some unfavorable weather during a long period there late in the season and it would have really crimped our preparations during that time, had we not had it."

Predicatably, Packer players have been enthusiastic about what they have fondly dubbed "The Barn." Linebacker Mike Douglass, for one, calls it "the greatest thing the Packer organization ever has done for the players."

The all-metal building, a 55,000-square foot structure which can be heated to 65 degrees, has not only proved valuable in-season.

"It has served as a practice area for all of our people who wanted to do additional work or practice special drills or similar type work during the off-season," Starr said, "Again, weather wasn't a factor. You could work in there year-around."

Curly Lambeau "would be very impressed".

Had Bud Grant's experience with the Minnesota Vikings' practice field "bubble," erected in mid-1980, solidified his feelings about the need for a practice facility?

"No, it just reinforced our feelings," he said, "because here was a very experienced coach speaking first hand of the benefits that they had received from theirs.

"Had Chuck Knox stayed at Buffalo, I might add, I know that such a practice area was a high priority with him. He was very impressed with ours even though it was in its early stages of construction when he was here for the scrimmage with the Bills last August."

The benefits of an indoor practice facility may be self-evident but what, Starr was asked, can a larger dressing room, jacuzzi and racquetball courts do for a football team?

"There is an immediate indication and awareness that the organization is attempting to go first class in its approach to winning," said the Packer coach, emphasizing "first class."

The racquetball courts, he also noted, will have a practical as well as recreational value. "They will be used by the players during the season on their off-days in an effort to loosen up and to engage in something other than their normal routine activities," he explained. "Racquetball is a great companion sport for football. The quickness, balance, movement, agility and endurance all can be improved by playing it."

Starr paused, an amused smile flitting across his clean-cut features, and he added, "We have a large number of players who have been anxiously awaiting the opening of the courts."

In addition to remaining competitive, and possibly getting a leg up on the competition, is the objective of the new facilities to attract players to live and train in Green Bay year-around?

"That's a bonus but it still may not be as realistic as in some cities where the climate specifically is more conducive to living there year-around," Starr admitted, "and where the size of the metropolitan area affords better opportunities for employment in the off-season."

As modern and comprehensive as they are, the improvements are not an end in themselves, Starr insists. Although loath to discuss them for fear of giving comfort to the enemy, he has other advances in mind, ones he intends to implement in the years ahead. Confining himself to generalities, he merely observes, "We will be aggressive in our planning and thinking for the future in an effort to always be among the leaders in the National Football League in every department."

What, he was asked, would the late Curly Lambeau say if the team's founder could see the current, $3,350,000 additions to the Packer complex?

"I know he would be very impressed, and surprised, but equally pleased he had contributed toward having this type of development occur as the result of his efforts," Starr said, "because he also contributed to the growth."

The elaborate new facilities, it was suggested, also are a far cry from what No. 15 knew as a Packer rookie quarterback 27 years ago.

"I'll say so," Bart chuckled. "I was shocked at the lack of size of the dressing room under the stands of East High Stadium when I arrived in Green Bay in 1956.

"Our new jacuzzi was almost as big as it was..."

Bob Schnelker

Making The Offense Go

Bob Schnelker talks to offensive players during pre-season victory over Bengals in Milwaukee.

By Chuck Salituro
The Milwaukee Journal

Even before the Packers clinched a spot in the National Football League playoffs for the first time in a decade, before they finished with the third best record in the National Football Conference, before they demolished the St. Louis Cardinals in the first playoff game at Lambeau Field since the famed Ice Bowl in 1967, before they completed their most successful season in 15 years with a hard-fought loss to the Dallas Cowboys in the second round of the playoffs...

...Yes, even before all of that, in early December, only five games into the strike-shortened 1982 NFL season, Bob Schnelker had determined that his first year as the Packers' offensive coordinator was a special one.

"This season ranks at the top, the best in my career," Schnelker said. "It's been everything that I could have hoped for."

That was no small statement. Last season was Schnelker's 20th as an assistant coach in the NFL. He has worked for six teams, the Packers twice, helping Vince Lombardi guide the Packers to victories in the first two Super Bowl games.

He has seen it all and done it all as an assistant coach in the NFL, but at age 54 he does not hide the fact that his return to the Packers last year proved to be his most satisfying season in coaching. Certainly, it was a successful return to Green Bay.

The Packers demonstrated major improvement on offense in 1982, tying Dallas for NFC scoring honors with 226 points. They averaged 323.3 yards per game. Their 41 points against St. Louis in the first round of the playoffs were the most ever scored by a Packer team in the playoffs. And they rolled up a whopping 363 yards in the second half against Dallas, rallying from a 20-7 deficit at halftime before losing, 37-26.

And when the credit was being passed out for the Packers' improvement on offense, much of it was directed toward Schnelker, who brought some needed authority and direction to the Packers' offense.

Coach Bart Starr said as much when he assessed Schnelker's performance. "He did a tremendous job coordinating our offense," Starr said. "Bob gave us a clear delineation of duties and assignments. I had worked with the offense in the past, but because of a lack of continuity with our kicking game with respect to the coaches we've had here the last several years, I felt compelled to spend some time with that over the previous three years.

"With Bob taking care of the offense, I had more time to spend with the entire football team. And also, I was able to work with just one person relative to my own feelings offensively.

"I just felt with someone orchestrating the offense we would be much more unified and stronger, and we were."

That's because Schnelker was and is the man in charge of the Packers' offense. He put together the playbook. He directed the meetings and practices. He called the plays. He called the shots.

And the way he did those things impressed those whom he worked with.

"I've got the utmost respect for Bob Schnelker," said quarterback Lynn Dickey. "Whatever Bob Schnelker wants to do is fine with me. He's made a believer out of me."

And there were several other believers, too, including the Packers' fans, many of whom had complained in the past about the Packers' ineffective play calling.

In recent seasons prior to the arrival of Schnelker, Starr technically was his own offensive coordinator. Starr and assistants Zeke Bratkowski and Lew Carpenter had designed the game plans and Bratkowski had called most of the plays, with input from Starr on the sideline and Carpenter in the pressbox.

But now it's Schnelker's offense.

"There's input from the other coaches," said offensive tackle Greg Koch. "Schnelker is not running a dictatorship, but in general, what Schnelker wants, Schnelker gets. He has a free rein to run the offense. And the results he has gotten have been great. He's the man that makes us go."

Schnelker did that by devising game plans that used the Packers' great talent at the skilled positions to best take advantage of the opponent's defense, and he often called plays that the opponent's defense least expected.

David Whitehurst, the Packers' backup quarterback, who usually stands next to Schnelker on the sideline, became exceedingly impressed with Schnelker's game plans and play calling.

"We've gotten away from the manly way of doing things, and we're doing what works," Whitehurst said. "We went away from the overpowering runs and mixing up our finesse plays

"Sometimes I'm surprised with the calls, like the reverse James (Lofton) ran for a touchdown against the Giants (in the second game of last season). I was very surprised at that call, and then it goes for a touchdown.

"I guess if it surprises me, it's also surprising the defense."

Certainly one of the reasons for the success the Packers had on offense was that Starr and his players acknowledged that Schnelker was in charge when it came to the offense.

Starr, in effect, has stepped aside and given Schnelker total control of the offense. That was very important for Schnelker. He demanded as much when he took the job.

"To his credit, Bart was willing to give me the responsibility that I like and wanted with the offense," Schnelker said.

It has been said that Schnelker needs total control to be effective, that when a player or coach questions his authority, as Monte Clark did in Detroit in 1981, the last of Schnelk's four years as the Lions' offensive coordinator, conflicts arise and Schnelker sours.

Said Whitehurst: "I think most everyone got along with Bob and he worked out well because everyone realized that you do it his way. You don't want to alter his style. You do it exactly the way he wants you to do it or you're going to catch some grief about it."

Packer players were reluctant to criticize the way the offense was run before Schnelker's arrival. Many of them originally thought that either Bratkowski, now offensive coordinator for the Baltimore Colts, or Carpenter, the Packers' receivers coach, should have been named offensive coordinator, and some feared the worst when Schnelker was hired.

All agree, however, that something had to be done to consolidate the way the offense was run.

Said tight end Paul Coffman: "Before, in a meeting, Zeke would say one thing, then Bart would say another, then Ernie (McMillan, the line coach) would say something else, and then they'd have to huddle to work things out.

"Now, Schnelker just stands up there and says how it's going to be, and that's how it's going to be."

Whitehurst added: "I guess you could say that Bart has done a good job of delegating his authority. Prior to Bob coming here, before Zeke could call a play, he would check with Ernie on the sideline and Lew upstairs. Bob doesn't do that. Now, one man is in charge. One man is responsible."

And that according to Koch, has made the Packers a better team. "We're much more efficient," Koch said. "We never have to wait for a play now. There isn't any of the hesitating that I think was there before last year. What Bob calls we run, and we all have grown to have confidence in him."

But confidence in Schnelker's ability to call the right play does not always translate into a personal liking for the man.

Unlike many of Starr's assistants in the past, who followed their boss' habit of never saying a discouraging word, Schnelker's personality won't allow him to do that. Ask him a question about a player and he offers an honest appraisal, even if it is a negative opinion.

Obviously, the player in question does not always appreciate being criticized by one of his coaches publicly. And although Starr has said, "We don't muzzle our assistants," knowing Starr, Schnelker's comments had to make him uncomfortable.

But for reporters and fans, Schnelker's candor was refreshing, like a breath of fresh air.

It was a trait that first became apparent last August, when Schnelker made his first public assessment of quarterback Rich Campbell, the Packers' No. 1 draft choice in 1981.

Said Schnelker of Campbell: "At this point, he doesn't show the arm strength it takes to be a fine quarterback in this league. He just can't zip the ball out there."

To which Campbell said: "What he said bothered me because I don't think it's justified. More than anything what he said surprised me. Nobody ever mentioned my arm strength before. It hasn't helped my confidence any. It caused me to question some of my own ability."

Yet, the two have maintained a working relationship. Since last season ended, Schnelker has been working with Campbell to cure him of a bad habit of dropping his arm before releasing the ball.

"We feel he's getting the ball off quicker now than he was before, and that's what we were trying to accomplish," Schnelker said. "By the time training camp begins, it should be more natural for him to do what he's doing. Now, he's sort of having to think about it."

Despite what he said about Campbell's ability, Schnelker appreciates Campbell's effort. He did not appreciate the play of fullback Gerry Ellis last season. Ellis, plagued by personal problems, did not perform up to the ability that Schnelker believes that Ellis has. So, when asked about Ellis just a few days before the Packers' playoff game with Dallas, Schnelker said, "Gerry Ellis had a crappy year."

To which Ellis fired back when asked: "He just says what he thinks. That's his opinion."

But it is Schnelker's opinion that counts when it comes to the Packers' offense, and he is looking for even more production than the Packers got last year, especially from Ellis. "We've got to get Gerry Ellis playing like he did in 1981," Schnelker said.

And there are other improvements needed in the Packers' offense. "The biggest thing we've got to have is to improve our pass protection, which broke down from time to time last season," Schnelker said. "That's an area in which you always have to strive to improve. We also have to cut down on interceptions.

"Other than that, there are not any glaring weaknesses. Last year, when we'd have a bad day, we'd have a very bad day. We have to eliminate those—we have to be more consistent."

And although Schnelker plans no major changes for the Packers' offense in 1983, he says that there will be some—Tim Huffman will be the starter at left guard, Ron Hallstrom probably will be moved from guard to tackle, more passing routes will be installed over the middle to make better use of John Jefferson and more formations with three wide receivers will be employed to make use of the talents of Phillip Epps.

All of which, Schnelker is hoping will help the Packers go even farther in the playoffs this season.

"I really think we were able to get something going here last year," Schnelker said. "But we can do even better. We should do better."

And if the Packers do play better, it will, no doubt, be due in large part to Schnelker.

All They Needed Was A Chance

By Dan Flannery, Green Bay News-Chronicle

Pardon the pun, but injuries are some of the breaks of the game of professional football. Careers can be ended with shocking suddenness; an abnormal twist of the knee or the ankle can be debilitating for anywhere from a day or so to a lifetime.

Football players accept that risk on a daily basis. Some thrive on it, some worry about it, and some try not to concern themselves with the possibility.

That ugly specter of potential injury is made no easier to deal with when you're being pushed for your job. In many cases, all an eager youngster needs to take his spot in the lineup is for the player in front of him to go down with an injury. As is the case in many occupations, all some people need is a chance to do the job.

Meet Tim Huffman and Randy Scott, two classic examples of the above scenario.

Huffman, an offensive guard from Notre Dame, stepped into the Packer line several times in 1982, filling in for injured teammates Derrel Gofourth and Leotis Harris. Much of his playing time came during Green Bay's drive to the playoffs, in the final month of the season.

Now in his third year, Huffman proved his worth in playoff contests against the St. Louis Cardinals and the Dallas Cowboys. Against the Cowboys, Huffman started at left guard in place of Gofourth and stood toe-to-toe against Randy (Manster) White, so nicknamed because a teammate once said he was half-man, half-monster.

The Huffman brothers, David and Tim, walk off field together after Packers beat Vikings in Milwaukee.

Although Dallas held off the Packers on that day, Huffman did a creditable job on White, a perennial All-Pro. And in so doing, he proved that much of football is mental.

"He battled with him, stood there and fought the man toe-to-toe," recalled Bill Meyers, who with Ernie McMillan coaches the Packer offensive line. "And when he did get beat, he came back without any worry about it. He didn't get psyched out by the fact that it was Randy White. He's not afraid to compete. "He'll play with anybody."

For his efforts, Huffman enters the 1983 season as a starting guard. Gofourth, who had a series of groin, elbow, knee and shoulder ailments, was asked by the Packers to retire during the off-season.

Although Huffman finished 1982 at left guard, he could begin the new season at right guard, according to Meyers, who was Huffman's line coach at Notre Dame.

The position—left or right—doesn't seem to worry Huffman, a ninth-round draft choice in 1981. It's the chance to fill a position, any position, that concerns Huffman.

"I'm more comfortable with my game," said Huffman. "I like to think that the other linemen are comfortable having me in there. But I think I still have to prove I can play consistently good football over the entire schedule."

Down the stretch in 1982, Huffman was subjected to a more-than-normal amount of pressure. As a second-year pro, he had very limited experience; he was replacing a popular member of the line; and his performance was critical for the success of the team in Green Bay's first playoff drive since 1972.

Much of the pressure, Huffman

Randy Scott raises arm in joy after extra point is blocked in Cardinal playoff in Green Bay.

admits, was self-imposed.

"Those two playoff games were some of the most exciting times of my life," said Huffman. "It's probably the closest I've ever come to throwing up before a football game, I'll tell you that."

The Packers have an unwritten rule about injured players: None will lose his job solely because he is injured. Still, that's just about what happened in the case of Gofourth and Huffman. With Huffman in the lineup, productivity was up, but so were Huffman's sensitivities.

"Once you're out on the field, there's little anybody can do about who's out there," said Huffman. "You have to make do with what you have. The other linemen were very supportive, constantly lending advice and encouragement. I found them to be very good to work with."

Still, Huffman had broken that unwritten rule. On the surface at least, he had only gotten a starting spot because Gofourth was hurt, a set of circumstances Huffman knew quite well.

"I was ill at ease last season," he remembered. "In my mind, that was his position. That was his job. I thought that I played better as the season went on, but still, with him coming back from those injuries, and he came back one or two times, I still felt the same way. As far as I was concerned, I was being replaced. I don't think you can take a guy's job when he's hurt."

At 6-feet-5, 280 pounds, Huffman gives the Packers more size at guard than they've had for some time. If he masters pass blocking in the near future, Huffman could be the most dynamic big guard the team has had since Gale Gillingham.

"He works hard," said McMillan. "He's a rough, tough, hard-nosed football player. As for flat getting after people, he's got those qualities. He can explode through people, and then he makes things happen at the right time. That's the controlled aggressiveness you look for in the offensive line."

Another of Huffman's qualities is his intelligence, a necessary trait for linemen. "He's extremely bright," said Meyers. "He's very, very smart, and he's working to become a more detailed football player. He makes very good decisions. His biggest asset as a pass-blocker is his ability to make good, quick decisions—to see things happen and to react to them."

"I like to think I'm very coachable," explained Huffman. "He's right. I can be hard to get along with because I like to do things my way. Some of these guys are so talented athletically, that they don't have to stop and think about things, they just react. I've got to look at the situation and decide in my mind if that's the best way to do it."

The positions are different, the situations are not the same either, but Randy Scott took a few steps back, weighed the alternatives and made the decision to sign with the Packers shortly after the 1981 draft.

Coming into the 1983 season as a starting inside linebacker in Green Bay's 3-4 defense, Scott looked back and offered, "I'll never regret doing that."

Scott earned his spot in a manner similar to Huffman. When Rich Wingo injured his knee late in th 1982 season, Scott, who also served as Wingo's substitute at Alabama, stepped in. His play throughout the rest of the season, including a 17-tackle day against Dallas in the NFC semi-finals, was impressive enough to keep Wingo on the bench even after he had recovered.

Although it took an injury to Wingo to give Scott an opportunity to play, Scott is quick to point out that he wouldn't have stayed in the lineup if his play hadn't been up to par.

"I don't feel it was unearned," said Scott. "I paid for this."

It is the second time Scott has replaced Wingo; when Wingo was drafted by the Packers in 1979, Scott filled the spot in the Crimson Tide defense. It is also the second time Wingo has, indirectly or otherwise, helped Scott find employment with the Packers. When no team selected Scott in the 1981 draft, he shopped his services through the NFL before narrowing the choice to Philadelphia and Green Bay.

After several discussions with Wingo about the Packer organization, Scott selected Green Bay. Great timing, it wasn't because the Packers brought a fleet of linebackers into summer camp that year. Some of the notables who didn't make the final roster included Ed O'Neil, Brian Cabral, Bruce Beekley and Kurt Allerman.

Packer defensive coordinator John Meyer recalled the summer of '81, and noted the impression Scott, who became a free agent because scouts were leery of his lack of size and speed, made on the team's coaching staff.

"I probably wouldn't have given him much of a chance, but as we observed him in practice and in games, he just kept catching our eye and catching our eye," said Meyer. "We suddenly realized we had a diamond in the rough. He just needed some polishing."

As is NFL custom for young linebackers, Scott's polishing was done on the special teams.

"It was rough," said Scott. "I was playing outside linebacker when I first came in. The light at the end of the tunnel didn't shine too bright."

"My rookie year, I just wanted to get my foot in the door," he explained. "I got to play in a couple of games, but that didn't go too good. I did all right on special teams."

Scott finished 1981 as the second-highest tackler on Packer kickoff covereage teams, third-highest on punt return coverage. Rumor around Lambeau Field said the Scott vs. Wingo battle would be one to watch in the '82 summer camp.

It was. Wingo, pushed hard to retain his starting job, responded with solid play. Scott, trying to make a name for himself, started against the New York Jets in the Bishops Charities Game and acquitted himself very well.

Wingo, the more experienced player, won the battle. Scott, who made his mark as a productive tackler, was relegated to another year on the special teams and in goal-line defenses.

"The guys that are producing play," Coach Meyer.

When Wingo went down, however, the Packers were relieved to have Scott available.

"All he needed to do was to get a chance to play," said Meyer. "Before Rich got hurt, we played Randy in goal-line and short-yardage situations to give him some exposure and he did an excellent job in that area. We felt very comfortable putting Randy in there because although he hadn't played a lot, we knew he was a capable player. All he needed was a chance to play."

Once Scott got his chance, he made the most of it. According to Meyer, Scott ended the season as the team's most productive defensive player, based on points awarded to players for interceptions, tackles, quarterback sacks, passes defensed, etc. Rated on a points-per-play basis, Scott averaged over .5 of a point per play. All other linebackers were in the .40 to .49 range.

Given those statistics, it's not hard to understand Scott's quick rise to a starting berth.

"We want to play the most productive people we have at the position," said Meyer. "Hopefully, we don't deal in personalities. The guys that are producing play."

And what about that unwritten rule? Wingo recovered from his knee problem before the first playoff game against the St. Louis Cardinals, but wasn't returned to the lineup. Productivity won out, it seems, over seniority.

Wingo, according to Meyer, accepts the change.

"He understands that," said Meyer. "If the shoe were on the other foot, I'm sure Randy would understand. They're good friends, yet they're intense competitors. They're both playing the same position."

"We're still good friends," said Scott of his relationship with Wingo. "It's not going to break up a friendship. "I'll let it go at that."

What's at the root of Scott's productivity? Work, followed by work, followed by work. In two years in the NFL, Scott has not only gained a better grasp of a professional defense, but he has improved his skills. His speed, around five seconds for the 40-yard dash when Scott first reported to the Packers, has improved to about 4.85 seconds. His weight, around 210 at Alabama, has been hovering between 220 and 225 pounds on his 6-1 frame. His strength has increased proportionately.

"We never have to worry about Randy being in shape," said Meyer. "He's pretty well goal-oriented. He knows what he wants and he's not going to let it go very easily."

His new found job is a perfect example of that statement.

"You just have to set your goals higher," said Scott, reflecting on his new frame of mind, that of a starter. "I'm still fighting for my life just to stay at that spot. I'll have to work harder than ever this year. It's always harder to stay on top of the totem pole because someone is always scratching, trying to knock you off."

Sometimes, those totem pole-scratchers are opponents; sometimes, they're teammates; sometimes, it's fate. But they're always there in the NFL. Someone will be more than happy to fill your shoes.

Ernie McMillan, who filled an injured teammate's shoes as a rookie with the St. Louis Cardinals in 1960, put such a situation into perspective: "You just have to be ready and prepared and take advantage of the situation."

In Huffman and Scott, the Packers seem to have two men ready to follow those words.

Professionalism Describes Lofton Jefferson Coffman

John Jefferson catches high, hard one in traffic.

By Tom Woodrow
The Oshkosh Northwestern

The term "history-making" has been applied to a great many National Football League pass-catchers down through the years. The record book is filled to overflowing with big names and incredible statistics.

In the context of multiple pass receivers from the same team earning all-pro status in a single season, however, the term "history-making" applies only to the Packer trio of James Lofton, John Jefferson and Paul Coffman.

Until the 1982 season, two wide receivers and a tight end from the same team had never been selected to play in the NFL's Pro Bowl in the same year. Not only did Lofton, Jefferson and Coffman play in the same Pro Bowl, they dominated the game. The contest turned into a showcase for Packer pass-catchers, and ultimately it was won by the NFC when Dallas head coach Tom Landry inserted the Packer threesome late in the game for a last-minute scoring drive that was climaxed by a John Jefferson touchdown.

How do three ranking pass receivers emerge from one team's roster? It would be easy to write it off to coincidence, or to fate, or even to the wheeling and dealing of the Packer front office. From the coincidental point of view, all three men emerged from the college ranks in 1978. From the fate viewpoint, it had never happened before, so perhaps it was bound to happen sooner or later. From the wheeling and dealing point of view, the Packers did make a big trade to acquire Jefferson.

But coincidence, fate and tradesmanship, upon close examination, do not suffice as explanations. Such an explanation does not show how the trio of Packers "earned" their status as Pro Bowl competitors.

Lofton, Jefferson and Coffman have something in common, a characteristic in their individual makeups that led them to the plateau of performance that they all achieved.

Wait a minute, you say! What could two big-city athletes have in common with a Kansas farm boy? The answer is simple. Professionalism. That is what each of the three sees in the other two.

"I think professionalism is exactly the term that best describes John Jefferson and Paul Coffman," says Lofton of his two teammates. "What I admire most about Paul is that he sets no limits on himself. When John Jefferson and I came out of college it was a foregone conclusion that we would both become all-pro wide receivers. That cannot be said about Paul. He was not drafted at all and he had no way of knowing what his destiny would be. He was just determined to be the best he could be, and while he gained the recognition that he deserved as all-pro last year, he still does not set limits on himself. That is why when we report to training camp, I can be sure that Paul Coffman will be in the best shape he can be in, the best shape of anyone in camp. That is professionalism.

"When I look at John Jefferson, I see a burning desire to win, I see a burning desire to be the best wide receiver in football, and I see a burning desire to contribute to team success, to be a team player. That is professionalism in the same degree."

Coffman admires Lofton and Jefferson not for what they were coming into the game, but for what they have made of themselves since becoming professional football players.

"James is a very intelligent man," says Coffman. "I guess I look at him as almost super-human. He is strong, fast and smart, and he has all the qualities you'd want if you were going to build your own athlete. Other people have those characteristics, but they don't all make use of them like James does. He drives himself to be the best in everything he does.

"J.J. (Jefferson) is not quite as fast or as strong, but he has so much natural ability, enthusiasm and drive that it makes him an equal to James. His charisma is incredible and he brings out the best in everyone around him. He even likes to dive around in the rain and mud, smiling the whole time, and that makes our work more enjoyable for everyone. He can put everything else in the back of his mind to concentrate on football, and that makes him the best."

Coffman doesn't use the word, but it sure sounds like he's talking about professionalism.

Jefferson's definition of professionalism would clearly include the ability to work together for the benefit of all, something which he sees in both of his teammates.

"Paul has become a good friend, one that unfortunately I don't get to see much of during the off-season," says the former San Diego Charger. "He is like having another brother and a very funny one at that. I guess I'm a little crazy, and so is Paul. When you put a couple of guys like us together in a locker room, it's like a big fraternity house once in a while. I believe you have to have some of that on a team so you don't take yourself too seriously.

"When I was with San Diego, I had heard that Paul Coffman was a very consistent player. Now I can see that he can catch passes with any tight end in the league. He is not selfish, he can wait his turn and he can do his job in a situation when he's not in the spotlight. Plus, he can block with the best of them, which sets him apart from a Kellen Winslow, who is basically a very big wide receiver. When you look at all that Paul can do for this team, he is better for our offense than a Winslow could be.

"As far as James is concerned," Jefferson continues, "I had heard the speculation that Green Bay wasn't big enough for both of us. That just hasn't been the case. We both knew what being on the same team could mean to us, that it would be better for both of us, and I think you can see that it is working out that way. With a balanced passing attack that spreads the ball around, you win more games and everyone gets more attention, more publicity. I was sure it would work out that way, and when you add a Paul Coffman it gets better still for everyone.

"I was told that if I came to Green Bay I would never see the playoffs. It didn't take long to disprove that one, did it? We all worked together well last year and made the playoffs, and I don't think our offense has totally matured yet. Once this offense realizes its complete potential in terms of versatility there will be no stopping us. I really have to laugh when I think about being told James and I wouldn't be able to work together. Right now we are in business together with Mike Douglass, another guy who is overdue for the publicity and recognition he deserves."

One very big aspect of professionalism that the threesome has in common is physical conditioning. They don't just get into good condition for the season, they never let themselves get out of condition.

"I have always had a great deal of confidence in myself, even when others haven't," says Coffman, who was once told by friends that he would never make it in big time college football, let alone the pros. "When someone tells me I can't do something, that just makes me more determined to do it. Take conditioning. I have never had as much natural ability as other athletes, but I have always been determined to push myself. I want to earn everything I get, and when you apply that to conditioning you quickly realize you can't let up. So I run distances, lift weights and exercise about four days a week, eight hours a day. I don't ever want to find myself getting tired on the practice field, so I strive to be in better shape than I have to be coming into camp."

Much of Jefferson's conditioning involves running, as one might expect from a wide receiver. Jefferson travels around the country a lot, but he runs for conditioning no matter where he is, and sometimes no matter what the weather is.

"The most dangerous thing I did in this off-season was to go running in a tornado watch in Texas," says Jefferson. "I figured that what the heck, it's still not as dangerous or as exciting as trying to catch passes over the middle, so away I went. Actually, though, if you want to stay on top of the pass-catching game, you have to stay in running shape all year, so running is my number one conditioner. Besides, I enjoy it a lot."

Lofton is every bit as determined to maintain his conditioning, but takes a somewhat different approach to it.

"I enjoy running and lifting weights, but I don't lift just to be a wide receiver and I don't run just to be a wide receiver," says the former Stanford All-American. "I run to improve myself as an athlete and I lift weights to improve myself as an athlete. I believe that if I am going to beat the defensive back who is guarding me, I have to be a better athlete than he is."

Despite all that they have in common, the three Packer pass receivers have rather dramatic differences. Lofton is married to a professional model and singer, lives in Milwaukee, enjoys photography and working in several charitable activities, has a degree in industrial engineering, and thinks seriously of getting into either broadcasting or business investments, or both, when his playing days are over.

Coffman is single, and lives in Kansas City with ex-college roommate Gary Spani, a middle linebacker for the Kansas City Chiefs. A native of Chase, Kansas (population 600), Coffman has never been a big city fan, and when he quits football he hopes to turn his agricultural degree from Kansas State into a career such as the buying and selling of grain, or grain mill management. He spends his spare moments working out, or playing racquetball or tennis. An avid hunter and outdoorsman, he has had to make some sacrifices along those lines to play football.

Jefferson, too, is single, and resides in Dallas, Texas, in the off-season. "I guess I don't really have a home right now," says Jefferson, "because I like to travel around so much. I go visiting guys I know all over the country. It just happens that I'm living in Dallas right now." Traveling, whether on the football field or off, is what the Arizona State product does best. He is a native of Texas.

Their backgrounds vary dramatically, but their goals vary only slightly. Not one of them has yet won a major football championship.

"I no longer set individual goals for myself," says Jefferson. "It is not important any more how many passes I catch. People in the league know me now, know what I can do, so my goal now is to win the big one. My biggest challenge is to see this team win and when we made the playoffs last year it was about the high point of my five-year career. I am satisfied now that I am on a team that can win the big one. People like Franco Harris and Howard Carmichael have told me they can see it coming in Green Bay, and that's good enough for me.

"My secondary goal is just to keep playing the game and enjoying it as much as I do. I still have an awful lot of fun. It feels so good to make a big catch, to beat a good club. My biggest thrill is still the celebration in the locker room after a great win. I really look forward to the start of a season, especially when your team has as much talent as this one does."

"My goal is to keep going in the direction I have been," says Coffman, "both in terms of myself and the team. I really strived to make the Pro Bowl, and now that I have, I can't stop. I want to keep going back. I thought it would be a great experience and it was, so much so that I am more determined than ever to go back. The same applies to the playoffs. That was great, and I am more determined than ever to go back, to go further. Last year I passed guys like Ron Kramer and Rich McGeorge in the all-time Packer statistics, and while I would like to continue to do that, it is more important to me just to keep playing football. My perfect day is to play a football game. It's what I do best."

"I guess I would like to be regarded as the best wide receiver to play the game," admits Lofton. "I have always wanted to be the best at whatever I do. I had a very good year last season and gained some respect around the league, but the way I see it, it doesn't mean much unless you keep getting better, unless you do better the next year. Until you win the big one, I don't think you have much to brag about. It is more important to me to win the Super Bowl. Individual accolades can't replace being a Super Bowl champion."

Only time will tell if they will ever wear Super Bowl rings like their Packer predecessors, but in the meantime this trio is running up some impressive figures of the individual variety.

Lofton, in five years, has 277 career receptions for 5,002 yards and 26 touchdowns. He has moved into fifth place among all-time Packer receivers in total receptions, trailing only Don Hutson (488), Boyd Dowler (449), Max McGee (345) and Bill Howton (303). He already holds the Packer record for most yards receiving in a single season (1,294), and in five years is well past halfway to Hutson's career record of 8,010 yards receiving.

Coffman in five years has caught 176 passes for 2,181 yards and 13 touchdowns. He has already passed all other tight ends in the Packer receiving record book and has twice had 50 or more catches in a single season. His 56 receptions in 1979 led all NFL tight ends.

Jefferson has amassed 265 receptions for 4,515 yards and 40 touchdowns in five years, and while he did not catch a touchdown pass for the Packers in the 1982 season, he caught two in one playoff game against the St. Louis Cardinals. Jefferson has twice led the entire NFL in touchdown catches for a season (13 both years) and has a season high of 82 receptions in one year.

Small wonder that all three should appear in the same Pro Bowl. What might be even more amazing is if it doesn't happen again.

"It's a great honor to be picked by your peers to play in the Pro Bowl," says Lofton, "but it is even more important to me to see other people from our team receive that honor, people like Paul Coffman and Larry McCarren who deserve it but have been getting overlooked. That has happened quite a bit. One year our defense led the league in takeaways, yet not one of our defensive people was picked for the Pro Bowl.

"The solution to this is to win, to get into the playoffs, and to win the Super Bowl, so everyone gets recognition. We had a taste of it last year, and I was disappointed that the only four Packers in the Pro Bowl were three pass catchers and Larry McCarren. A team is only as strong as its weakest link, and the Pro Bowl selections tended to exclude our quarterback, our running backs and our entire defense. John, Paul and myself do not lead this team to victory by ourselves.'

Coffman agrees. "I like to think of us as a great trio, and I like to be associated with James and John as a trio, but the fact that we made the Pro Bowl also has to mean that we had one of the best passers in the league at quarterback, that we had an offensive line to protect him well enough to get us the ball that much, and a defense good enough to make our offensive point totals stand up.

"With guys like J.J. and James around to help us win, we are getting three Monday Night Football shots this year. It would be nice if we could turn those games into more recognition for all the other people on this team."

"We made a little history in the Pro Bowl this past season, and we are all going to get a little more attention after this next one," says the ever-enthusiastic Jefferson. "Wait and see and you'll agree, the Packers will arrive in '83."

How Packers Were Built

Coach Bart Starr is building the Packers via the college player draft and, through the 1982 season, 35 of his athletes were produced by the draft. Thus, the Packers are virtually an all home-grown product.

For spice he has added three key performers via the trade route—Lynn Dickey, John Jefferson and Tim Stokes. With only 12 draft choices each year, free agents have become vital in building a team and among the key people are Johnnie Gray, Paul Coffman, Casey Merrill, Gerry Ellis and Randy Scott.

Here is how the Packers were built but don't forget these athletes are being challenged this year by a new crop of draftees and free agents:

Fullback Art Schmaehl — with a patched up broken nose in 1921.

The Green Bay BLUES

(FORMERLY PACKERS)

The Blues are back!

That sure doesn't ring like the Pack is Back.

Yet, the Packers played an entire season known as the Green Bay Blues.

It was 1922—the Packers' second year as a member of the American Professional Football Assn., which later changed its name to the National Football League.

Note the letter on the adjoining page from Packer Coach and Captain Curly Lambeau to Art Schmaehl, a hard-hitting fullback who played so well in 1921. The date is Sept. 17, 1922 and the letterhead reads in part — (Formerly Packers).

The League accused the Packers of using college players during the 1921 season and the Green Bay management was afraid that it might lose its membership, which is what happened. The minutes of a meeting in Canton, Ohio on Jan. 28, 1922 included this:

"Again the matter of the Green Bay franchise came up and Mr. Clair (J. Emmett) of Green Bay, after a discussion with the club members, asked the Association to consider the withdrawal of the Green Bay franchise with the apology to the Association. A motion to this effect was made by Mr. Halas (George) and seconded by Mr. O'Toole. Carried."

Thus, the Packers had withdrawn from the league. However, at a meeting in Cleveland in June, 1922 the League granted new memberships to four clubs, including Green Bay.

The Green Bay people decided to drop the name Packers for the next season (1922) because the team known as the Packers had been withdrawn, plus they were fearful of any action the League might impose. The League had used the withdrawal as a sort of "cosmetic" example of how it would punish teams using college eligible players.

It wasn't easy using the Blues in newspaper stories about the Packers in 1922. The local Press-Gazette at times used three names—the Blues, Bays and even the Packers.

The Milwaukee Journal, in advancing a Green Bay-Milwaukee Badger game said this: "The Badgers are shaping up nicely for their game against the Green Bay professionals, who won national fame for three years as the Packers but whose official "monicker" this year is the Blues."

Finally, the management gave up trying to change the name. The fans simply wouldn't adjust ... plus the league never complained.

And what about the aforementioned Art Schmaehl?

Art only played one year with the Packers, but he has the distinction of scoring the Packers' first touchdown in league play. It was against the Minneapolis Marines and resulted in a 7-6 Packer victory after Curly Lambeau drop-kicked the extra point.

Schmaehl had played seven years of professional football with various teams in Detroit, Chicago and Muncie before Lambeau signed him for the Pack in 1921. He was a well-muscled 150-pounder, who could play any position in the backfield. He scored at least one touchdown in every game but one the Packers played that year.

Dr. E. S. McNevins, the Pack's field physician at the time, called him "the toughest piece of flesh I had ever seen." Schmaehl had been in an out of Green Bay in the late 1900s on government communication business. In fact, he helped coach Green Bay East High for the last few games in 1918 and the victories included a big 20-6 win over West High.

In the letter to Schmaehl, Lambeau is hopeful of getting him back to the Packers by offering him the princely sum of $65. The only other player getting that much or slightly more was the quarterback, Charley Mathys.

As it turned out, Schmaehl had himself a sweetheart in Detroit named Gladys, who said she wouldn't marry him unless he promised not to play professional football. Pro football wasn't exactly an honored profession back in those days.

That was the end of Art's football career, but he never lost touch with Green Bay. He became a loyal Packer booster despite the fact that his home was in Chicago, a Bear stronghold. He attended most of the Packer alumni homecoming events until his death in 1967.

Schmaehl played against all the early greats of football and gave one in particular, the fabled Jim Thorpe, a little problem.

Thorpe, the great Indian running back, was off on a long touchdown run and Schmaehl was the last man between Thorpe and the end zone. Art promptly flattened Thorpe on the five-yard line and this was the reaction from Thorpe:

"You little s__ of a b____, they came out here to see me, not you."

This is a reproduction of a letter Coach and Captain Curly Lambeau wrote to Art Schmaehl in 1922. Note letterhead reads (Formerly Packers).

Dear Friend Art:

We have a good team and are practicing every day. Buck, Murray, Moose Gardner, Owens, Nadolney constitutes our line with Dunnigan and Faye on ends. Our backfield is composed of Regnier of the Manines, Taugher and Cronin of Marquette, Davis and Chas. Mathys. With exception of Mathys these fellows are playing for forty and fifty per game and living here. Now Art I want you to play here if possible. Ihaven't it all to say but Iknow Ican get 65a game for you. If these figures are satisfactory please let me know at once. The management will not pay yourtransportation from Detroit. There is a business man in town furnishing us all the money and he is the man that decides every money problem. He wants his name Kept out of Athletics or it would be made public. Our first game is the 24th so we will have to rush things along.

With kindest personal regards

Curly

United Front Helped Pack

Fans showed displeasure over strike with this sign during party in Packer parking lot on a non-game Sunday.

By Mike Christopulos
The Milwaukee Sentinel

The acrimonious 57-day National Football League players' strike last fall had a jarring effect on all parties involved.

It ripped some teams asunder, caused everybody—the owners, players, merchants, the television industry—to lose money and may have damaged pro football's popularity, at least temporarily.

James Lofton, who turns a phrase as well as he catches a Lynn Dickey spiral, offered the most apt description of the longest walkout in the history of pro sports.

"It (the strike) is kind of like going to war," said the Packers' gifted all-pro wide receiver and player representative shortly after the strike ended on the night of Nov. 16. "You're glad it's over. You try not to think about it and you're just thankful that you're a survivor and not a casualty."

Lofton and his teammates not only survived the strike, but fashioned a 5-3-1 record in the strike-aborted regular season and earned the Packers' their first playoff appearance since 1972.

The Players Association and the owners' Management Council didn't reach terms until the eleventh hour. If the strike had dragged on just a few more days, chances are the rest of the 1982 season would have been scrubbed.

As it was, some teams never were able to hit their stride again once play resumed. The feuding Detroit Lions were a prime example of this. The Lions won their first two starts in 1982 before the strike intervened. However, Detroit then won only two of its seven post-strike appearances and had to settle for a mediocre 4-5 record.

According to Lofton, the Lions were hurt because they had some "personality conflicts" among their players.

"There were some very strong union players in Detroit," said Lofton. "There were also some people who were apathetic toward the union. They didn't want to find out what was going on and they would bad mouth the union.

"It really hurts when you're involved in a cause and then someone speaks out against it when they don't really know the facts."

Like the Lions, the Packers got off to a 2-0 start, but Green Bay didn't collapse when play resumed. Green Bay's success was predicated on several factors. The Packers may have had some minor differences privately, but publicly the players presented a united front. Just as important was the fact that between 30 and 40 Packers stayed in Green Bay during the strike and staged informal workouts at St. Norbert College.

"We didn't go our separate ways like a lot of other teams," said linebacker Mike Douglass. "I think we had more guys working out than any other team. Football is basically unity and team play."

Lofton felt Green Bay's fast 2-0 start had a lot to do with the Packers' eventual success last season.

"Our informal workouts and keeping good communications helped out, but I think the most important thing was that our team thought we had something going before the strike and we wanted to carry that on no matter how long the strike lasted," said Lofton.

After the strike ended, Coach Bart Starr said he thought his Packers' 2-0 start would help them psychologically. That's precisely what happened as Green Bay took up where it left off by flogging the Minnesota Vikings, 26-7, and raising its record to 3-0, the Packers' best start since 1966.

The Vikings, despite the fact they racked up eight quarterback sacks, didn't appear nearly as sharp or alert as the Packers. Typical of Green Bay's heads-up play was the one Packer free safety Maurice (Mo) Harvey recorded to start the second half.

Harvey stole the football away from Minnesota's Sam Harrell after Harrell fielded the kickoff and raced 25 yards for a touchdown. Harvey's bit of thievery widened the Packers' lead to 19-7 and broke Minnesota's back.

Starr said the fact his minions worked out informally on a daily basis during the strike proved to be a big plus.

"I'm certain the Vikings also worked out, as did other teams," said Starr. "But we told our players when they came back that we were pleased with their efforts while they had been away because they stuck very closely together and deserve a lot of credit. We don't have that many people who live year-around at Green Bay, so it was a unique situation for them to stay so close."

Ironically, the Packers participated in the last game played before the strike took place. It occurred on a Monday night Sept. 20 at East Rutherford, N.J. before 68,405 disbelieving fans at Giant Stadium. The Packers overcame a 19-7 deficit to demolish the New York Giants, 27-19. Lofton's 83-yard scoring run on a brilliantly executed reverse touched off Green Bay's comeback late in the third quarter.

The strike was called just about a half-hour before the Packers ate their pregame meal at the Meadowlands Hilton Hotel in East Rutherford.

James Lofton leaves Packer dressing room with his belongings after strike is called.

If the Packer players were shocked or surprised by the news, they didn't act like it.

"We expected the strike," said wide receiver John Jefferson, "I don't care. We'll take everything in stride."

"It's not surprising but we've got to win the game tonight and be 2-0," said cornerback Mike McCoy. "I think that's the feeling of most of the players."

"It's like sitting in a waiting room in a maternity ward. It's going to come out sooner or later," was the humorous way defensive end Byron Braggs greeted the news of the impending strike.

When the Packers returned to Green Bay following their win over the Giants, two Packer officials made what proved to be significant statements to a reporter.

Judge Robert J. Parins, the Packer president, and Starr said they were opposed to fielding a scab team by signing free agents.

"I doubt that I would look with favor on signing free agents and fielding a team for that purpose," said Parins.

Asked if he would like to coach a team of free agents, etc., Starr replied: "No, I wouldn't."

During the strike, Parins, Starr and other Packer officials kept a low profile. That pleased the Packer players.

"In our organization, the ownership has always stayed in the background and tried to make the team the most important thing," said Lofton. "We're lucky we don't have someone who is out trying to grab headlines everytime there is an issue that comes around."

Offensive tackle Greg Koch agreed saying, "We didn't have a Leonard Tose (owner of the Philadelphia Eagles) blasting all the players or somebody like the guy in Kansas City who said fire them all. And we didn't have any dissension on our team."

Lofton deserves much of the credit for the Packers' harmonious stance during the strike. He kept his teammates fully informed of what was going on. Lofton downplayed his role as Packer player representative.

"All our players played a part," said Lofton. "They were all receptive to the views that I had and also they were very receptive to each other as far as listening to each other and trying to air out differences and heading in one direction."

Economically speaking, the strike cost the city of Green Bay and the Packer organization a wad of money.

The Packers suffered a net loss of $2.2 million in 1982. All of it was "entirely attributable to the players' strike" according to Parins. The net loss was the largest in the history of the Packers franchise and also marked the first time since 1951 that the Packers had suffered a net loss.

Three Packer games at Lambeau Field were wiped out by the strike. Each game meant a loss of $1.3 million to area merchants, according to the Green Bay Area Visitor and Convention Bureau.

In many NFL cities, fans stayed away in droves following resumption of play. That was not the case with the Packers. Fans in Milwaukee and Green Bay didn't boycott the Packers after the strike ended. The Packers drew crowds of 49,480, 51,922, 56,191 and 55,137 in four post-strike games, including one in the playoffs.

While it lasted, the strike changed the lifestyle of all Packer coaches and players, not to mention rabid Packer fans.

Starr spent many of his football-less Sundays doing odd outside jobs around his home in DePere. On the strike's first Sunday—a day in which the Packers were originally scheduled to play the Miami Dolphins—Starr cleaned out about 40,000 leaves cluttering up his swimming pool.

"It's kind of a therapy for him," Starr's wife, Cherry, said at the time.

Dickey jogged a couple of miles in the morning and then spent the rest of the day watching television. Koch went for a ride on his motorcycle along the Fox River in DePere and also played golf. Place-kicker Jan Stenerud climbed the fence at Minahan Stadium and practiced his kicking.

Strike or no strike, Packer fans did what they do best—held a tailgate party.

About 5,000 people showed up at Lambeau Field on Sept. 26—the day on which the Packers were to have played Miami—set up their charcoal grills and began having a good time.

A group, which called itself the Green Bay Fun Club, organized the bash. People began arriving at the Lambeau Field parking lots around 10:30 a.m. and many of the parties were still going strong around 8 p.m.

"The people were well behaved the whole day," a Green Bay police officer said. "We didn't have to make a single arrest."

During the strike, Dickey endeared himself to his teammates when he went on record and said he fully supported the players' efforts to get a bigger slice of the financial pie.

"The wage scale won't affect me all that much," said Dickey.

"I could come out pretty well ahead on the incentives part of it, but if everyone it didn't affect just said, 'the hell with it' and just dropped out, what kind of unity would we have?"

Was the strike worth it?

A vast majority of Packer players felt that it was. Guard Leotis Harris was the only one who publicly said the strike "was just a waste of time."

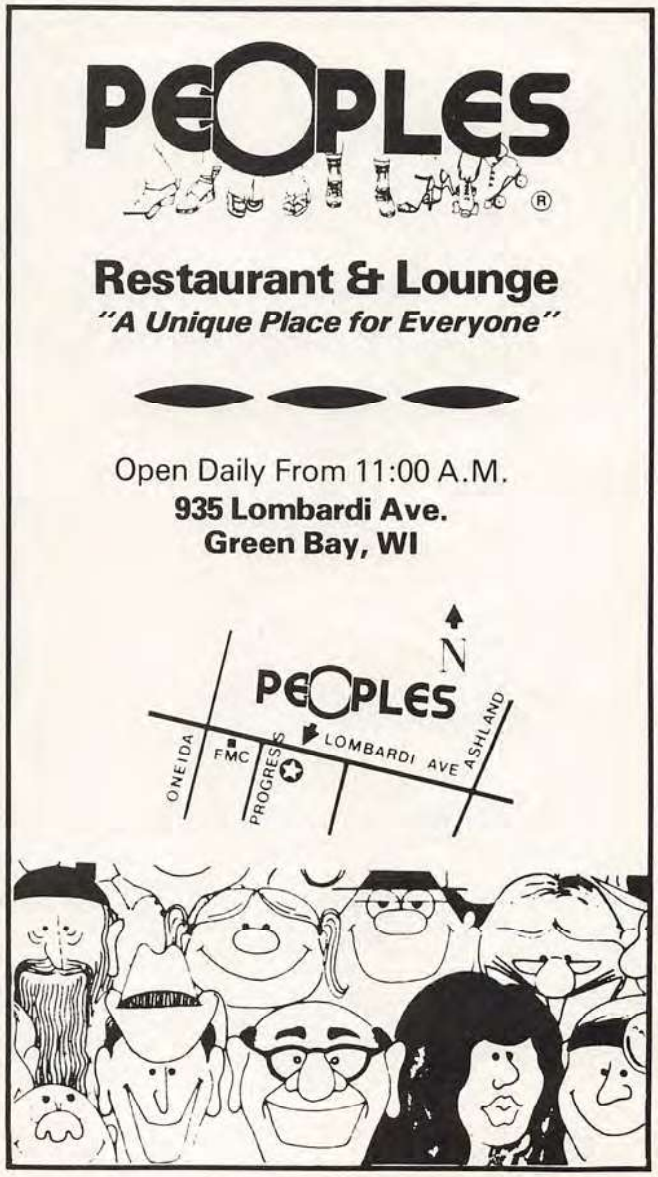
"We had a goal as far as money and a percentage of the gross and we didn't get that," said Harris.

Lofton naturally saw things differently.

"When I came into the league in 1978, a rookie could have signed a contract for $22,000, $26,000, $30,000 and $32,000 for his first four years," Lofton pointed out.

"You look at a rookie now and if he's able to make the team for four years, his minimum salary would be $40,000, $50,000, $70,000 and then $80,000," he continued.

"If you talk to guys like Jan Stenerud, when they came into the league, a lot of players were making only $10,000 to $12,000 a year. Things have changed dramatically."



JOHN ANDERSON

A Quiet Man on the Hot Seat

By Bud Lea
The Milwaukee Sentinel

John Anderson relaxes during waning moments of Packers' victory over Rams in Milwaukee.

This is a story about a Packer linebacker.

No, not Mike Douglass, who talks a blue streak, high-fives with his teammates after sacking the quarterback, is eminently quotable, wears a gold earring and lives up to his nickname, which is Mad Dog.

This is about Douglass' less-flamboyant friend, the linebacker who plays opposite the tight end in the Packers' 3-4 defense, John Anderson, the guy who says "hello" at the beginning of the season, "goodbye" at the end and not much in between.

In a professional football world that is so much hoot and holler and grunt and groan, Anderson is a whisper in a gentle breeze. Always there. Often unnoticed.

Truth is, Anderson is so much quieter than Douglass in both playing style and personality, that he tends to get lost in the shuffle and has gotten used to being ignored by the media. Nevertheless, he does the job and does it so well that he was selected the Packers' most valuable player on defense last season.

Whereas Douglass tackles fiercely and tries to intimidate quarterbacks and running backs physically and verbally, Anderson relies on his pure athletic ability to get the job done with a minimum of backslapping or recognition.

OK. So John Anderson is no great orator. But his football speaks volumes: 50 unassisted tackles, five of them behind the line of scrimmage; three interceptions; two fumble recoveries; seven knocked-down passes; one sack. All of this, mind you, was accomplished in nine games during the strike-shortened 1982 season. He also led the defense with the fewest missed tackles (4).

John Meyer, the Packers' defensive coordinator, calls Anderson an introspective person who plays professional fooball at a consistently high level.

"We put John on the hot seat by having him defend against the tight end," Meyer said. "He's dealing with some pretty talented individuals. John does what you ask him to do. Last year he had a superb season.

"I don't think there's anything he can't do. And now that we're having a little success as a team, I think both he and Douglass are going to have individual success.

"Two years ago, Douglass was miffed and, perhaps rightfully so, about not going to the Pro Bowl. I think Anderson had that kind of a year.

"John's grades and production are always high. He's the kind of a guy who is a pleasure to coach. He's not testing you all the time. He's just a joy to be around. I like him the way he is."

Anderson is a Waukesha, Wis., product, where he was a star offensive end and kicker in high school. He became an All-American linebacker at the University of Michigan and was a first-round draft choice, along with wide receiver James Lofton, in 1978.

"When you're drafted it's a great feeling," Anderson said. "You get all the publicity and the hype, the big contract right off the bat. Boy, everything is great.

"You realize in a few weeks when you go to training camp you have to be able to put into production something they can see. Then it becomes a pressure situation."

Anderson responded immediately to the pressure and appeared destined for stardom from the start as he intercepted five passes in his first 14 pro games. But then came three years of heartbreak. He broke his arm in the 14th game of his rookie year and twice more in the following two years. The injuries cost him 18 games.

Only a bone graft in 1980 seemed to have saved it. Anderson played in all 16 games in 1981 and 11 last season with a protective pad. And now he takes the field without fear of further injury.

"Staying healthy and playing a full season two years ago turned things around for me," Anderson said. "Mentally, that was important. Physically, it was vital that I did that because I think my career was on the line.

George Cumby gets cheer from Mike Douglass after recovering fumble at Detroit.

"I was frustrated. There was nothing I could do. I thought I had worked my arm back into shape during each offseason. Everything was 'all systems go' until I broke it again. Everytime I broke it, it was just one big frustration.

"I kept thinking, 'Is this really the end?' and 'How long can they put up with a guy who keeps breaking his arm?'"

Now, Anderson looks back and realizes that a broken arm can heal completely. It's not like a knee, the most dreaded injury in football. If you went into a knee three times, or a neck, that player certainly would be looking at a limited career.

"My arm is healed," Anderson said. "It's healed and sound, and I have no ill-effects from it."

It's a closed issue. Meyer said that he and Anderson don't even talk about it any more.

It was Anderson's second broken arm that allowed Douglass, a fifth-round draft choice in 1978, to move into the Packers' starting lineup in 1979. And as the colorful and talkative Douglass played into the spotlight, he became a media hit. Reporters swarmed around Douglass' locker because he was a lively interview.

"At first it bothered me," Anderson said. "It was natural, I guess, an emotional kind of thing.

"But I think I've gotten to the point where I realize what my role is on the team. My position is one that I've got to do the job and look to myself for recognition rather than other people because it's a position that's not going to be in the limelight."

Today, Anderson has no hangups about Douglass.

"We don't have any problems," he said. "I think people try to create problems because we're so different. We play the same position, but there are different responsibilities.

"It doesn't bother me that he gets more attention. He's going to get the quarterback sacks because that's one of his roles on the team. Maybe if he can get in there and harass the quarterback, he'll cause him to hurry his throw and I can get the interception."

Anderson doesn't promote himself. He is never controversial. When he says something, it comes from the heart. He is also suspicious of the media.

"I've been burned in small ways," Anderson said. "There have been times that I have been misquoted, or things I've said taken out of context. They may be small things, but the press doesn't realize the power it has in forming public opinion. Just a few words can make a whole difference between a positive reaction among the fans or a negative reaction."

So John is extremely careful what he says but, at the same time, interested in what other players say.

"I like to read between the lines," he said. "When I read stories about the Bucks, Brewers and Packers, I tend to read different things into players' quotes.

"I try to ask myself, 'Is that something they've said for publicity?' or 'Is that something they really feel?' Or, are they hiding something? I've put myself into that situation a few times. I've had to learn to do that. I guess I've come to realize that the press can do a lot of really harmful things to a coach, player, to anyone in a very short time."

Most of his teammates can't remember Anderson being loud, or obnoxious, or stirring up something.

Tackle Greg Koch, no shrinking violet, claims Anderson is a lot more outgoing than the media has made him out to be. Well, like what? Greg.

"He's a prankster," Koch said. "He's always doing stuff in the locker room. The players never know who it is. But it's always Andy.

What kind of pranks? Greg.

"If you get hit in the back of the head with a piece of tape, it's going to be Andy. It's little things like that.

"The bottom line is not what you do with your mouth. The bottom line is how you perform. Andy performs as well as anybody on our team. And he's respected as much as anybody on our team."

As long as his teammates and coaches respect him, it would appear that Anderson is the kind of player who never needs a pat on the back. Meyer said that is not true.

"John probably won't admit it, but he likes to know he's done a good job," Meyer said. "When he does a good job, I tell him.

"He's such an introspective guy that he knows when he's done a good job and when he hasn't played up to his potential. He's very realistic and self critical. But he also likes to know that he's done a good job."

"There are some individual things I'd like to do," Anderson said when asked about goals in the NFL. "But I'd just as soon keep those private.

"I'm not one to go blabbing about what I want to achieve before I get out of football.

"From a team standpoint, I want to get to the Super Bowl. That's become more of a goal as I've gotten older. Maybe it's because every year it goes by it's one less chance that you have. The more you put into football, the more you want it."

In real life, Anderson is involved in the real estate business. He and his wife, Susan, purchased a home in Elm Grove, a Milwaukee suburb. He likes to strum his guitar, cook, putter around the house and play golf and tennis with his wife.

He appears to have everything. A great marriage, a great home, a great job.

Of course, he could use a little more recognition.

Jubilant fans tear down steel goal posts after Packers' playoff victory over Cardinals in Green Bay.

Playoff Wait Worthwhile

By Don Langenkamp
Green Bay Press-Gazette

The Green Bay Packer fans who were still in their teens had heard their parents talk about it, but they had never seen one.

The middle-aged Packer fans remembered it as part of their giddy youth, and some of them had been lucky enough to witness it in person.

And the older Packer fans remembered it as a time when they were not yet grandparents and still hard at work raising families of their own.

"It" was the famed, storied Ice Bowl game played between the Packers and Dallas Cowboys on Dec. 31, 1967. That game, of course, became one of the legendary epics in Packer and National Football League annals. But it gained a new dimension of significance—and revived all the rich old memories—last January.

Why did the Ice Bowl become prominently mentioned once again after all those years? Simply, because it was the last time there was a post season playoff game at Lambeau Field.

The Beatles were in the midst of their heyday, John Glenn was an astronaut instead of a U.S. senator, and Bart Starr was a quarterback instead of a head coach.

But now a generation had passed and the cherished, musty memories of the Ice Bowl stepped aside for the new fans, the new Packers and, yes, a new playoff game. It had been a long wait, more than 16 years. But in the madcap postgame revelry that completely enveloped Green Bay on Saturday, Jan. 8, 1983, everyone agreed the wait had been worthwhile.

Worthwhile by a 41-16 bottom line. Worthwhile because of the glamour names such as Jefferson and Lofton. Worthwhile because once again, at least for a heady few weeks, the Packer name was resurrected as a member in good standing of the NFL's ruling class.

Yes, the Green Bay Packers were back in the national spotlight. Save for a brief appearance in the 1972 playoffs in Washington, D.C., they had dutifully closed up shop every season since the Ice Bowl when the gun sounded on the final regular season game. But now, finally, here they were—hosting a postseason game once again.

The strike and strife-filled season was behind everyone now. Those leaden weekends without football were like bad dreams to the Packer faithful. Forget all of that. Forget the fact that it took just a 5-3-1 record to earn the right to host a playoff game. Forget the fact that ticket sales fell just barely short of a sellout and a television blackout remained in effect.

When the day dawned on Saturday, Jan. 8, the only important thing was that the St. Louis Cardinals were in town and the Pack was still in the Super Bowl derby. The weather was a pleasant surprise, at least for Green Bay in January. With the mercury nudging into the upper 20s, conditions seemed near-ideal for some richly entertaining football.

But no one—absolutely no one from Bart Starr on down to the greenest beer vendor—imagined how richly entertaining this Saturday would be. No one, not even in his wildest dreams, conjured up visions of a resounding 25-point win. No one predicted anything more than a game falling somewhere between the "cliff-hanger" and "very tight" categories.

Certainly no one boldly came out predicting those final numbers: Packers 41, Cardinals 16. But as thousands of fans careened wildly on the postgame field and the stadium was awash with the throaty roar of triumph, those were the figures on the scoreboards overhead.

It didn't begin that way. In the very early going, in fact, things didn't augur well for Green Bay. With Neil Lomax passing and Ottis Anderson running, the Packer defense was being played off its feet. But like a favored fighter rocked back on his heels in the first round, the Packers regained their balance just in time. With Anderson—the recipient of a hard tackle—wobbling off to the sidelines after the Cards picked up a first down on the Green Bay 3-yard line, the defense stiffened. And Anderson's replacement, Stump Mitchell, could manage just two yards in three thrusts, forcing St. Louis to settle for a field goal.

In retrospect, it may have been the game's turning point. Starr would look back and say, "I think it ultimately proved to be a special moment in the game. Had they scored, you're looking at some different prospects."

At that point, however, Packer fans were trading bewildered looks, and the consternation grew moments later when Gerry Ellis fumbled the ball back to the Cards on Green Bay's third play from scrimmage. Once again, St. Louis began a determined march toward the end zone. But this time the drive stalled on the Packer 17, and the field goal try wen awry.

Coach Bart Starr flashes smile as it becomes apparent Packers will beat Cardinals in playoff at Green Bay.

Then two unrelated events effectively sealed St. Louis' fate and brought an end to its 1982 season. First, there was the resurrection of John Jefferson, Yes, the forgotten JJ, the multi-talented receiver who had lived in the shadow of his thoroughbred running mate James Lofton all season, suddenly was back on center stage.

While Lofton was drawing more attention from the Cardinal secondary than Jane Fonda would at an Elks Club meeting, Jefferson was Lynn Dickey's primary target this day. That was clearly evident. On the third play after the missed St. Louis field goal, Dickey zeroed in on Jefferson for 60 yards and Green Bay's first touchdown.

It was a scene that would later be repeated, complete with Jefferson's patented hand-shaking sweep past the first-row fans in the end-zone. This time it was Lofton in a supporting role with three catches for 52 yards, while Jefferson hauled in six for 148 yards and two touchdowns.

The other part of the turnabout had nothing to do with Green Bay's play. But when Ottis Anderson went down with a severely sprained ankle, it virtually forced the Cards to instantly revamp their offense. As young Neil Lomax put it with a sheepish smile, "You saw the ball go in the air."

Fifty-one times, to be exact. And while Lomax managed 32 completions and a bundle of yardage, he divided his touchdowns and interceptions equally at two apiece.

There was no trade-off, no balancing of the ledger, for Dickey, however. Four touchdown passes, no interceptions. The Packers came out with a pass-oriented attack and Dickey executed it to perfection. And he did it behind an offensive line that not only did not allow a sack, but didn't even allow St. Louis to hurry the composed Dickey.

That, in turn, allowed Jefferson, Lofton and their teammates to work free time and again. St. Louis Coach Jim Hanifan was virtually powerless to put a halt to the carnage. "The things we were concerned about, worried about, were Jefferson and Lofton," said Hanifan. "They certainly did us in."

They certainly did. And the sparkling offensive showing was sweet balm for Jefferson, who several times during the season had complained that he wasn't playing enough of a role in the Packer attack.

"I felt I wasn't contributing," JJ said. "What I said wasn't an attack on the coaching staff at all. We had a great game plan out there today. You saw the results."

So did the fans, and they reacted in kind. It was a stadium and city-wide demonstration of joy reminiscent of, yes, that sub-zero final day of 1967. It was a welcome-home statement to a dynasty that had gone dormant and now, perhaps, was showing the first signs of a reawakening. It was rowdy, it was impromptu and it was relatively harmless—except to the Lambeau Field goalposts.

The Packers' security director, Al Stevens, directed his people to not try and halt the 5,000 to 7,000 fans who stormed onto the field. "Nothing short of our losing would have saved those goalposts," he said.

Postgame Green Bay was a scene of jubilation. One set of goalposts was dragged down the middle of Lombardi Avenue through stalled, horn-honking traffic. Bars throughout the city overflowed with fans hell bent on celebrating this historic occasion in spirited fashion.

Tonight, it was time to savor; tomorrow was time enough to worry about next week's opponent.

Dallas. To the surprise of no one, the Cowboys loomed seven days hence. In the wake of the swash-buckling win over the Cards, the Ice Bowl memories resurfaced again, even though the game was to be in Dallas.

It seemed to capture the imagination of the national media. The Packers' resounding triumph brought in net-work television crews and journalists from national publications. Who were these new Packers? How did they win that playoff game with what seemed to be ridiculous ease?

The word was getting out on this explosive Packer team. Like its dynastic predecessor of the Sixties, these new Packers were gaining legions of fans from unlikely parts of the nation. Green Bay was again fast becoming much more than just another Upper Midwestern city of 100,000 citizens. It was recapturing that special aura, that mystique it once had.

The Cowboys in Texas Stadium, to be sure, were far more formidable than the Cardinals in Lambeau Field. But the impact on that one-sided win in Green Bay was such that the more optimistic observers felt the Packers had a realistic chance of winning another playoff game.

Everyone agreed, following the Cowboys' 37-26 win, that the Packers had won the second half. There was a consensus that Green Bay had simply committed too many mistakes to win the game. But the spirited comeback during which the Packers outscored Dallas 19-7 and outgained Dallas 363 yards to 103 in the second half did much to enhance the Packer image.

No longer, a nation full of viewers and readers realized, was this a team struggling to keep its head just above the murky waters of mediocrity. And even while Green Bay was bowing out of the playoff picture, observers were knowingly predicting, "Wait until next year. They'll be back in it."

The television networks apparently agreed. Green Bay is scheduled for three appearances on ABC's Monday Night Football this season. And the Packers will be the nationally televised second half of two Sunday afternoon doubleheaders.

So the St. Louis game in Green Bay seemed to set the stage; it seemed a portent of greater things to come. It seemed to tell these hardy fans that the wait for another playoff game on their home field will not be nearly so long as the last one.

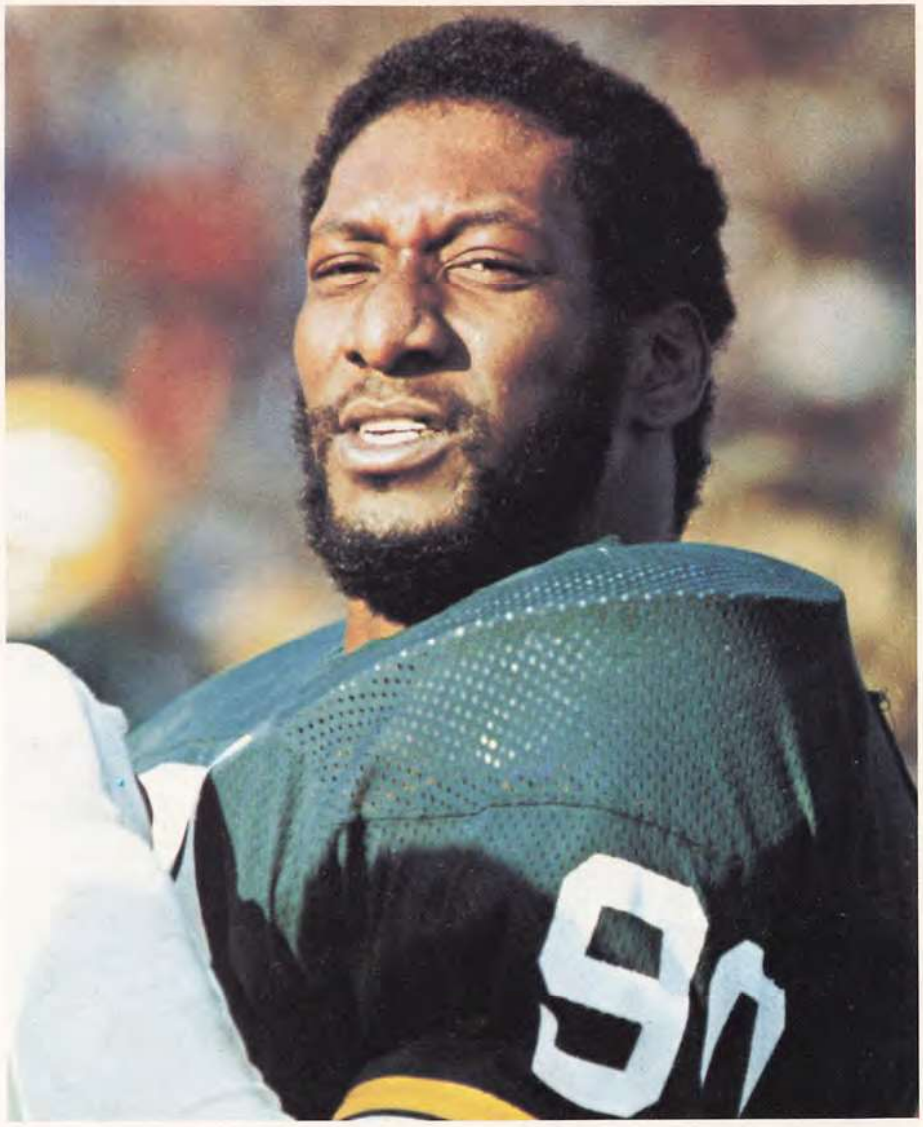
"I've Matured As An Athlete And A Man"

By John Hughes
Wisconsin State Journal



In first game after strike against Vikings, Ezra Johnson appears serious and dedicated.

Ezra Johnson used to look at professional football as an extension of the game he played in high school and college—better competition, certainly, but still "all fun and games."

In high school in Shreveport, La., and later at Morris Brown College in Atlanta, football was easy for Johnson. As a senior defensive lineman at Morris Brown in 1976 Johnson registered 112 unassisted tackles, including 28 sacks of the quarterback.

He was a first-round draft choice of the Packers in 1977 and the good times kept rolling. By 1978, his second season with the Packers, Johnson was an all-pro defensive end. He had earned a reputation as a fearsome pass rusher by finishing second in the National Football League with 20½ sacks.

But the success proved to be elusive. The good years were followed closely by three years of mostly frustration. He was forced to the bench several times by injuries and finally in 1981, although healthy, he lost his starting job to Casey Merrill. The fun was missing.

"I was constantly down on myself," he says.

He sprained his left ankle in the fifth game of the 1979 season and missed the next five weeks. The following year he started 15 games, but was slowed by a nagging back injury. "It caught me totally by surprise," he says. "I was almost helpless as far as getting out and running and being able to participate in practice and in contact. "The same thing happened the next year (1981) which resulted in me having to alternate with Casey," he says.

Johnson had been awakened to the reality of professional football.

"The business aspect of this game hadn't really hit me in my first couple of years," he says. "But it is a business. If you don't get out there and do what you have to do, then somebody else does it."

Then came the 1982 season. Though shortened by eight weeks by the infamous players' strike, it turned out to be one of the most satisfying for Johnson.

Living through the ups and downs in his career has had a lot to do with the maturation of Ezra Johnson, 28 years old in September.

"I've changed a lot," he says. "I'm living at a lot slower pace. I've matured as an athlete and as a man."

Indeed. He even took what he called "the big step into the unknown" in May by marrying Carmen Sparks, whom he met six years earlier when both were students at Morris Brown.

Ezra Johnson, a married man? The idea is hard to get used to. He was maybe as free a spirit as anyone who wears the green and gold of the Packers.

"I've had my share of fun," he says, chuckling at the memory.

But the former heavy-partying, fun-loving Johnson is ready to accept the new responsibilities of family man. "All the partying and that stuff is behind me now," he says.

Maybe the frustrations are behind him as well.

The bad days were symbolized by an incident that happened late in the final preseason game of 1980. The Packers were being hammered by the Denver Broncos, 38-0, at Lambeau Field when Johnson was observed sitting at the end of the Green Bay bench eating a hot dog. The incident got Johnson lots of publicity, plus a hefty fine. It also led to the notion that he no longer had a burning desire to excel in the NFL.

Johnson is truly hurt by that accusation.

"My father was a great influence on me," he says. "When I was a junior in college he and I were watching a playoff game on TV during Christmas break and he told me, 'That's where I want to see you at, son; playing in the professional ranks.' That same year he passed away. I really went after it (a professional career).

"I'm a self-motivated guy," he says. "I may not do a lot of jumping up and down, but I motivate myself. I know what I have to do on practice days and on game days."

Johnson can look back now and joke about the hot dog controversy. "Attitudes have changed," he says, meaning his as well as those of his detractors.

"I don't let things that people say bother me anymore," he says. "There was a time when people would say I couldn't play the run, and it would really get to me. I would be thinking about that and it would be like I was trying to go out to prove a point. I think that took away from my game some."

The rap "he can't play the run" also haunted Johnson. He played at between 235 and 240 pounds and that was deemed as too light to battle the behemouth offensive linemen who steamrolled ahead of ball carriers.

When the Packers switched from a 4-3 to a 3-4 defense in 1980, Johnson's "weakness" was further magnified. He tried to bulk up. He tried, but he couldn't. So Merrill, at 260 pounds, played in running situations.

Ezra Johnson sacks QB Neil Lomax of Cardinals in playoff in Green Bay.

Then last year, Johnson learned something that millions of people already knew—it becomes easier to gain weight as you get older. His scale read 253 pounds after the summer of 1982. A change in metabolism, he concludes. "Right now I eat less than when I was really trying to gain weight, stuffing food down my throat," he says. "I didn't get any results before. Now I eat less and gain weight. It must have been my metabolism."

With his new metabolism at work, Johnson regained his starting position and helped the Packers to their most successful season in more than a decade. Johnson led the team in quarterback sacks with five, and the defensive line in tackles with 47.

"I felt good about my performance," he says. "I can't say I was outstanding, but I think I played well."

Once again he was reunited on a regular basis with his friend and running mate at defensive end, Mike Butler.

"I can go out and do my job and know that he's going to be there doing his," says Johnson. "We get on each other and we help each other as much as possible. He critiques me and I critique him. We work very well together."

Johnson is again comfortable with his station. "I know what is expected of me and I know how to play the game and what I have to do to keep myself physically and mentally prepared to play," he says. "The tension and pressure are not on me anymore."

Football has become fun once more. "When you win, you have fun," he says. "There's no animosity between players and between coaches and players. Everybody's focusing on one thing, and that's to continue to win. I like that; I really like that."

As a personal goal, Johnson would like to lead the league in sacks. "I'm very ambitious," he says. "It's possible.

"It's very, very hard to put pressure on the quarterback out of the 3-4," he says. "In passing situations you're getting double-teamed. It's five against three, and if they leave a back in to help out it makes it even harder.

"But I think it's still possible to lead the league in sacks. It'll just be a lot harder."

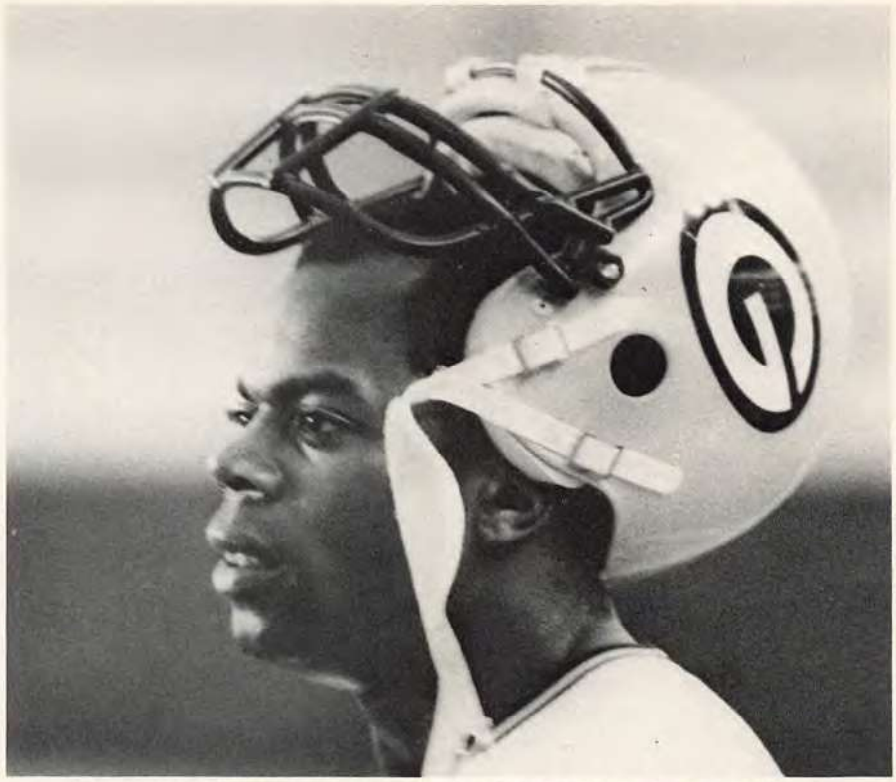
This is new Ezra Johnson—with a wife, a changing metabolism, a more relaxed outlook on life and maturity gain through seven seasons in the NFL.

"It goes fast," he says. "I'm glad that I feel good. When I look back on it, I say, 'Wow, seven years.' It just doesn't seem like it.

"I hope at the end of another seven I can look back and say that again."

TIM LEWIS

A Valuable Commodity



Tim Lewis relaxes a moment during Packer mini-camp in May.

With more emphasis on passing—plus the recent rules changes giving offenses more aerial freedom, defensive backs are rapidly becoming a more valuable commodity.

Six DB's were chosen in the first round of the 1983 College Player Draft—about a fourth of the 28 athletes selected.

The Packers made Tim Lewis, a cornerback out of the University of Pittsburgh, their first pick. He was the 11th player chosen. A DE, Terry Kinard, was chosen by the New York Giants just ahead of the Pack. Other defensive backs picked in Round One were Leonard Smith of McNeese State by St. Louis; Joey Browner of Southern Cal by Minnesota; Gill Byrd of San Jose State by San Diego; and Darrell Green of Texas A&I by Washington.

Lewis is only the second defensive back ever chosen by the Packers in the first round. The first was Willie Buchanon of San Diego State in 1972, the seventh player chosen. Buchanon played seven seasons in Green Bay and then was traded to the San Diego Chargers.

The Packers picked two other Defensive backs in the draft—Carlton Briscoe of McNeese, a teammate of Smith, and Jimmy Thomas, a basketball player out of Indiana, who has considerable football potential.

Lewis had a Packer tryout before the draft and he had a hunch he'd get selected by Green Bay. "When they picked me I was really excited and happy to become a Packer," Lewis said.

Lewis has fine speed—better than 4.5 in the 40-yard dash and Defensive Coordinator John Meyer had this to say after the Packers' mini-camp: "He's a real smooth athlete. He has the ability to stay in his backpedal. And with his speed he can break on the ball."

Here are the Packers' 1983 draft choices and the figures in parentheses designate the order of selection of the 336 players chosen by the 28 teams:

1st Round — Tim Lewis, DB, Pittsburgh (11), choice from New Orleans in Bruce Clark trade.

1st — Choice to San Diego in John Jefferson trade.

2nd — Dave Dreschler, G, North Carolina (48).

3rd — Choice to Houston in Angelo Fields trade.

4th — Mike Miller, WR, Tennessee (104).

5th — Bryan Thomas, RB, Pittsburgh (132).

6th — Ron Sams, G, Pittsburgh (160).

7th — Jessie Clark, RB, Arkansas (188).

8th — Carlton Briscoe, DB, Mc Neese State (216).

9th — Robin Ham, C, West Texas State (243).

10th — Byron Williams, WR, Texas-Arlington (253), choice from Houston in Mark Koncar trade.

10th — Jimmy Thomas, DB, Indiana (271).

11th — Bucky Scribner, P, Kansas (299).

12th — John Harvey, DT, Southern California (327).

The 1982 Season . . . In Statistics

The strike created some strange twists during the 1982 season, chief of which was the shortened schedule.

In addition, the Packers' storied rivalry with the Chicago Bears was wiped out. The Packers were to play at Chicago Oct. 10 and then host the Bruins Oct. 31.

The Packers and Bears had tangled every year since 1923 and now have played 125 games. It is the oldest—and often bitterest—rivalry in the National Football League. Since 1923, the Packers and Bears played each other twice a year and on six occasions tangled three times in the same season.

The 1983 Packer-Bear rivalry is compact. The two combatants will play twice in the last three games. Chicago visits Green Bay Dec. 4 for the 126th meeting and two weeks later the Pack invades Chicago.

Eight games were wiped out by the strike, including a two-game set with Tampa Bay. Eight regularly-scheduled games were played and one game was added by adding a week to the schedule.

Program cover of last Bear game — in Green Bay in 1981. Packers won 21-17.

Source: Best's Review, November, 1982.

We're #1 in the rating.
In the life insurance industry, A.M. Best Co. is recognized as the performance rating authority. In their November, 1982, Best's Review they've compared the actual dividend performance (not illustrations) over 20 years of the largest life insurance companies in the country. In all four categories that were the basis for comparison, Northwestern Mutual Life ranked number one. Outdistancing all other companies including such well-known giants as Prudential, Metropolitan Life and John Hancock, as shown in the chart above.

Additionally, based on their analysis of financial position and operating performance, A.M. Best Co. has assigned Northwestern Mutual their highest General Policyowner's Rating of A+ (Excellent).

How we intend to stay #1.
Our current performance is only a prologue to our future. Because we will continue to offer policyowners outstanding values and more innovative programs to answer their needs.

Our most recent program, UPDATE '83, will offer our policyowners the opportunity to increase their dividends. Some up to 40% or more — without an increase in premiums. A revolutionary program to be sure, but for Northwestern Mutual it's just another reason why for over 125 years we've been a leader in low-cost, long-term life insurance. A record that is the envy of the industry. And a record that makes other companies realize we're a tough act to follow. Simply because we're best . . . in Best's! "Call about our exciting career opportunities, too."

The Record Book

With only a nine-game schedule, the Packers were unable to produce any new individual records in 1982.

However, Wide Receiver James Lofton entered the Record Book by posting the third longest run from scrimmage in Packer history. It was an 83-yard run on a reverse against the Giants in New York. Ahead of Lofton are Andy Uram's 97-yard run in 1939 and Jim Taylor's 84-yarder in 1964.

Be reminded: The following records are presented with apologies to all the Packer greats who played before records were kept:

Black and Blue

Remember the Black and Blue Division?

It was the Central Division of the National Conference made up of the Packers, Vikings, Lions and Bears.

The late Norm Van Brocklin, first coach of the Vikings (1961-66), coined the Black and Blue phrase. Each team played each other twice and each team had a murderous defense. Hitting was the name of the game.

The Buccaneers joined the group full-time in 1977 after playing every team in the NFL the previous year. After three start-up years the Bucs reached the playoffs on the strength of a mean defense in 1979.

The B and B Division is still around. In fact, it made a little noise during the strike-torn season of '82. Four of the five teams made the 16-team playoff tournament—more than any other Division. The Packers and Vikings each won their playoff openers while the Lions and Bucs lost.

There was no Division race in 1982—only the Conference run as you'll note by the final standings, but the Pack still came out on top. Thus, in effect, they'll play this year as Division Champs.

THREE MONDAY NIGHTERS

Future Packer line? With a big lead late in the Cardinal Playoff, the Packers came up with this offensive unit: (L to R) Angelo Fields, Tim Huffman, Larry Rubens, QB Rich Campbell, Ron Hallstrom, Greg Koch and Gary Lewis.

The Pack must be back!

At least the National Football League schedule makers, plus the television industry, apparently feel that the Packers are a team on the rise.

Why? The 1983 Packers could be seen on national television as many as six times—and then more if they are able to reach the playoffs.

The Packers have a huge following around the country. Not only because of the oddishness of their franchise but from the fact that they've been winners over the years—what with 11 NFL championships, plus two Super Bowl wins!

Now that the Packers are becoming a proficient, exciting and explosive team, they are getting the showcase treatment via three Monday night appearances—plus a national TV pre-season showing.

In addition, they are ticketed for the second half of the Sunday national TV doubleheaders. These presentations can be knocked off if the Packers and their opponents for the two games are suffering in the standings.

The first Monday nighter has the Packers playing the New York Giants outside Big Town Sept. 26. These two teams played a Monday nighter in '82—the last game before the strike, which started the next day. The Pack won that one 27-19 with a 20-point rally featuring an 87-yard run off a reverse by James Lofton.

The Packer Schedule

Sun., Nov. 27—Falcons at Atlanta, 3:00.
Sun., Dec. 4—Bears at Green Bay, 12:00.
Mon., Dec. 12—Buccaneers at Tampa Bay, 8:00.
Sun., Dec. 18—Bears at Chicago, 12:00

The second Monday nighter has the Super Bowl champion Washington Redskins visiting Green Bay's Lambeau Field Oct. 17. No. 3 on Wash Night will have the Pack playing at Tampa Bay Dec. 12.

The two possible national TV games have the Packers at Cincinnati Oct. 30 and at Atlanta Nov. 27. Both are 3 o'clock starts.

The pre-season national TV game will have the Philadelphia Eagles invading Green Bay on Saturday afternoon, Aug. 20. It will be the 23rd annual Bishop's Charities game.

The 34th annual Midwest Shrine game, a fixture in Milwaukee, will be played in Green Bay for the first time due to a conflict with the contending Milwaukee Brewers. This game, vs. the Cleveland Browns, will open the season Saturday night, Aug. 6.

The Packers play seven home games (five league and two pre-season) this season. Three league games are scheduled in Milwaukee County Stadium.
